The Cooperative Consortium for Transdisciplinary Social Justice Research brings together faculty, students, and community members from many different backgrounds and disciplines to incubate, support, and promote innovative social justice research.

Faculty, students, and community partners pursue innovative community-engaged research on key social issues, such as access to physical education, housing justice, climate change, literacy development, criminal justice reform, HIV stigma/risk/resilience, food access, war and displacement, LGBTQ health, and human trafficking.

We've already seen impressive outcomes and impacts from these projects. Examples of these impacts include:

- New training protocol for medical students and UofL health facilities
- Publication of a book of poems by girls in Youth Detention Services, which also serves to inform policymakers about justice reform
- 30 Chromebooks given to middle school science students
- New quality physical education program implemented at local bilingual school
- Survey instruments, rapid assessment tools, and other recommendations provided to Louisville Metro Government for improving community engagement
- Changes to Louisville's Land Development Code to permit diverse housing at diverse price points in new geographic areas
- Re-design of downtown UofL pediatric waiting room, which includes a library of culturally-relevant children's literature.
- Numerous events, art exhibits, and awareness campaigns
